

Question: Tell me about a time when you had to deal with a co-worker who wasn't doing his/her fair share of the work. What did you do and what was the outcome?

When I was working in a teaching session, I was co-teaching with another teacher who had more experience than I had at the time. I soon realized that the teaching session was not going to achieve the objectives or the time frame required due to a teaching error on the part of the other teacher. I did not feel like it was appropriate for me to bring this up in the teaching session, but after the session, I addressed my concern to him. I referenced the teaching model that we use as our guide and the impact that it had on those we were teaching. I then asked what I could have done differently to better set him up for success as the primary teacher. Moving forward, that honest conversation helped us to better work together as co-workers, and the next time we worked together, we were able to have a united and powerful teaching session.

Question: What do you expect from a supervisor?

I have had the opportunity to work with supervisors who both helped me achieve the company's goals and my personal goals. I have also worked with supervisors who inconsistently changed expectations for me and my team, which led to confusion and contention within our team. From those experiences, I have come to really value supervisors who provide clear leadership and help me to align best with the company's goals and my personal objectives.

Question: Do you consider yourself successful?

I feel like the word successful is often considered to be a completed word or concept i.e. once I have completed a project or achieved awards, then I am successful. While I have been able to achieve awards and projects that I am proud of, I believe that success and being successful is made up of the small and intentional choices made along the way to work towards one's goals and to help those around themselves. That version of success is something that I am still working towards to become a version of myself that I, my family, and my employers can be proud to know.
